Craven, or the Croton Aqueduct Board, has been addressed to Comptroller Brennan, with reference to his action in declining to be present at the opening of proposals. The Hoard consider the position that the Comptroller has taken to be unwarranted by law and unesiled for by existing facts. In consequence of the argent applications for the immediate prosecution of the works adversised by the parties who have applied for them, and other argent reasons, the Hoard concedes so mach as to say that the improvements in question are "absolutely required." The Beard expresses a determination to conditue to cenduct the work intrusted to it according to its best judgment, and sets fouth that it cannot help it if public improvements are stopped by the refusal of the Comptroller to be present at the opening. The only work advertised for a "street not opened by law" is a sewer in 127th street. Between 3d and 4th avenues. Assessments for the work there done have been laid and sollected, and the error in supposing that such could not have been done unless the street had been expressed for expression for sewers alone are wasting advertisement, and notifying the Cemptroller that the opening, which has been adjusted to the 5th inst., was in consequence of his absence, again adjustment to 11 A. PAGANINI'S CONCERT The Story of a Wooden Shoe.

Towards the end of September, 1832, it was announced amongst the artistic circles of Paris that Nichols Paganini had fallen seriously ill at the conclusion of a grand concert given by the illustrous violinist. He was attacked by a low intermitting fever, which refused to yield to the remedies employed, and even gave rise to apprehensions for his life. Paganini, whose leanness was already almost spectral, now seemed to have his frail existence suspended by a thread, which the slightest shock might sever. The physicians unanimously ordered solitude, absolute repose, and a strict regimen as to diet. In order to carry out these prescriptions Paganini removed to the Villa Lutetiana, in the Faubourg Poissonniere. This excellent establishment, which no longer exists, was intended exclusively for the reception and cure of wealthy invalids. A spacious, comfortable house stood in a large park-like garden, where each patient could ramble at will, and enjoy either solitude or society at his choice. A great charm of this house was that every one lived just as he or she pleased, in the evening either retiring to the solitude of his apartment or joining in the games, music, and conversation held in the drawing room. Paganin naturally belonged to those who preferred passing the evenings in quietness and retirement. There was plenty of gossip about him in the drawing-room; three or four censorious old maids fell on him tooth and nail.

"Ladies," began one, "have you seen this great musician! It as alutes no one, and never speaks a word. On he morning of the 24th of December, our of Paganini's female critics were in onsultation together.

'It will be for this evening,' said one.

'Yes, for this evening; that's settled,' relied another.

"Yes, for this evening; that's settled," re-lied another.

After dinner, Paganini was, according to is custom, seated on the drawing-room so-a, sipping his sugar-water, when an unuan-il roise was heard in the corridor. Present-y, Nicette entered, and announced that a orter had arrived with a case, directed to signor Paganini.

"I don't expect any case," said he; "bul I suppose he had better bring it in." Accordingly, a stout porter entered, bear-ing a good sized deal-box, on which, be-sides the address, were the words, "Brittle, with care."

rich care."

Paganini examined it with some cur losity, and having paid the messenger, proceeded to open the lid. His long, thin, but extremely muscular fingers accomplished that task without difficulty, and the company, whose curiosity caused them somewhat to transgress the bounds of good manners, crowded around in order to see the contents of the box.

crowded around in order to see the content of the box.

The musician first drew out a large pack et, enveloped in strong brown paper, and secured with several seals. Having opened this, a second and then a third envelope aff peared, and at length the curious eyes of twenty persons were regaled with a gigantic wooden shoe, carved out of a piece of ash, and almost large enough to serve for a child's cradle. Bursts of laughter hailed the discovery.

So saving, and scarcely saluting the company, Paganini withdrew to his own apartment, carrying with him the case and its

During three days he did not reappear if the drawing-room. Nicette informed the company that he worked from morning till might with carpenters' tools. In fact, the musician, whose hands were wondrously flexible and dexterous in other things best ha violin playing, had fashioned a perfect and sonorous instrument out of the clumsy wooden shoe. Having enriched it with one silver string his work was complete.

Next day, a public notice appeared that on New Year's eve, Pagamini would give a concert in the large hall of the Villa Luictiana. The great master announced that he would play ten pieces—five on a violin, five on a wooden shoe. The price of the ticket was fixed at twenty france each. Of these only one hundred were issued, and it is needless to add that they were infinediately purchased by the wealthier portion of the community, who, during several month, had missed the pleasure of hearing Pagamini. "Does it cost vory dear!"

"This year men are tremendously dear, on account of the report that there is going to be a war. Fifteen hundred france is the lowest price."
